

Sonic Museum

Curator: the Museum Journal is soliciting manuscripts for a themed issue

Museum professionals frequently invoke “multi-sensory” and “immersive,” to recognize the role of both concepts in translating museum knowledge and creating emotional, memorable experiences. This special issue of Curator will explore the contribution of sound to multi-sensory awareness. We seek manuscripts that consider how museums are experimenting with sonic experience to advance emotional responses, balancing stimulation and reflection, knowing and feeling.

Music and sound can contribute to museums in various ways: as a museum object, interpretation tool, visitor’s engagement device, architectural revelation, creative opportunity for artists, and as conceptual model. How is sound implicated in visitor’s understanding of themselves and their relationship to history and culture? How can sound affirm, comfort, and challenge? This Special Issue will welcome perspectives from designers, acousticians, technicians, policy makers, front-end delivery personnel, museum educators, and curatorial staff.

Topics could include (but are not limited to):

- Multi-sensory and immersive: Clarifying definitions, goals, potential, and risk. Considering sonic elements of multisensory experience, emerging technology platforms, and the ephemeral;
- Sounding objects such as musical instruments and other sound-producing devices: Delivering on intangible/sonic heritage, what can be “played;”
- Sound in art, as art (time-based media art) or used to convey environmental or science content;
- Extending the museum: Case studies or reviews of digital/portable content (take home or in the museum, mobile apps, pre-/post-museum online discovery, or post-visit experience; Building and exhibition design’s impact or contribution to spatial awareness of architecture;
- Accessibility considerations for visitors requiring hearing or visual accommodations; and
- Reviews of soundscapes, sound and/or music museums and exhibitions (successes and setbacks, case studies)
